WASHINGTON, July 10, 1863.

NEW YORK DELEGATES.

The city is full again with returning Federalists from New York. They come back jubilant over the nomination of Mr. Forney. The universal idea is that the country needs a great civilian at the head of affairs. It is sick of too much soldier. It wants a statesman, and Seymour is a statesman of the first water. Blair is indeed a soldier, but he is also a civilian and not a soldier to hurt, being good for the volunteer vote. The ticket creates unbound enthusiasm among all classes of delegates who are now thronging the hotels in route for home.

THE PRESIDENT.

Notwithstanding the cheerful tone of the President to Secretary Welles, who consoled him to the White House news of the nomination of Seymour, I learn that he has expressed the deepest mortification to some of his most confidential friends. His says he was sacrificed at New York by those to whom he had every reason to rely. To one he declared that he had had entire confidence in the justice of the convention, but that now he should appeal to the justice of posterity.

The New York World seems to have anticipated the Democratic National Convention.

It declared the other day that it was a real "show" and that the party was not strong enough to win the election.

We are to make the Democracy of Kentucky and all such of the people of the State as are anxious, whatever they may have called themselves hitherto, to aid in rescuing the country from the destroyers and placing it in a safe and independent condition, to apply themselves at once and with the utmost energies of their lives to the performance of the vast duties and obligations pressing upon them. It is time for vigorous work, and the time is now.

The conservatives of Kentucky, on account of their consciousness of strength, have, up to this time, been far less active than they would have been if they had entertained a doubt as to the result of the election.

It is now evident that our cause is lost.

We must, therefore, put out our best efforts to bring out our whole strength and to rally around us.

Kentucky, as we have said, holds her State election on the third of August.

Today is the eleventh of July. Only two months remain before the day of our State election.

The time is short, but the harvest, we believe, is ripe, and the reapers are ready.

"Put ye not to the test."

Let not a day or an hour be lost.

Though we have not to win every voter but simply to bring them to the polls, we must do our best.

And we must do our best.

As we have said, the time is now.

But we must do our best.

As we have said, the time is now.
